The Great Storm

By Thornton W. Burgess

Scorn the law and the shirt;

-Strined Chipmunk

As Striped Chipmunk had told Peter Rabbit, he had planned to start work on a new storehouse that very morning, a storehouse for winter supplies. That was one reason he was so happy. No one knews better than does Striped Chipmunk how great in the joy of honest work, especially of work you like to do and can do well. So instead of worrying and fretting because he had that work to do Striped Chipmunk was giad of it. Instead of putting it off to the last minute, as Peter Rabbit would have done, he could hardly wait to eat breakfast, he was so eager to start digging.

Chipmunk spang! on the end of his nose he jumped up on a store of the old wall and sat up for a look around Great clouds were piling up and piling up in the sky. Some of them were very black with white edges. They were moving across the sky very fast, for they were driven by a great wind. Jolly, round, bright Me. whisked inside.

"Let it storm," said he. "Let it thunder and lighten and blow and rain. Down here I won't know anything about it. That is one of the advantages of having a home under ground. I can go right on working on that new storehouse just the same. A storm up there makes no difference to me down here."

me down here."

But for once Striped Chipmunk was mistaken. That storm is still known as the Great Storm, A great wind one limbs from trees, pulled some trees up by their roots, snapped others of midway of their great trunks, blew down fences and sheds and chimneys and did all sorts of harm. Then followed a rain so heavy that it seemed as if the sky must be made of water and it was all falling to the earth at one time. The lightness and trees. Thunder shook the Neville had been shot twice. The bullet which caused death penetrated the left lung, it entered his body through the left chest, above and to the right of Naville's shield. The other bullet passed through his right hand from the back to the palm, glancing along his right arm near the armpit. The only other wound was a slight abrasion of the left thumb, evidently sustained when Neville fell, while reaching for his revolver.
